Listening Comprehension

You can follow a lively conversation between native speakers and understand most of the information covered in a conversation around you with some effort but participating can be a bit difficult if several speakers don't modify their language in any way. Following the information from academic talks, reports, and other forms of professional discourse that have complex content will be easy for you. You can also understand announcements and messages on concrete and abstract topics in standard language at normal speed. If you are in casual conversation, it may be difficult for you the speed, the accent, and the expressions used by other people. To improve this skill, Leah recommends you watch videos of comedians in English and listen to podcasts with formal and advanced vocabulary on your topic of interest.

Reading Comprehension

You can read reading material related to your field of interest and easily understand the main ideas. You can quickly scan long, complex text and locate relevant details. Understanding some advanced words in the texts can be complex, but some you can understand from context. To improve this skill, Leah recommends you read audiobooks that are at an advanced level. Pay attention to the new vocabulary and the specific expressions that the author uses, they can be representative of their place of origin or where the story takes place.

Language Use

You can talk about the past, use a high number of phrasal verbs, talk about wishes in the present and the past, talk about habits in the past, and talk about events that happened before others in the past. At this point, your major challenge is to boost your vocabulary. You need more formal and specific vocabulary. To improve this skill, Leah recommends you read books on your favorite topics. You can also find a native speaker to help you practice and learn new expressions and vocabulary.
